EMBELLISHED TO SUIT ALL STYLES OF DECORATION.

Instruments That Harmonize With Louis XV, Louis XVI and Empire Decorations. Pianos For Modest Homes and Slender Persons—The Convenient Piano Secrétaire

There are houses where thousands of dollars are spent in furnishing a drawing room in a particular style. Then a piano is put in utterly inharmonious with everything else and jars like a silk hat on a man in armor. An every day instance is a dainty, fanciful Louis XVI drawing room with a huge concert grand piano in ebony case, richly gilded and standing on flat lathe turned legs. This hideous black monster is decidedly out of place. If in that drawing room were placed a superb instrument with marquetry cover of tulip wood and mercury gilt mounts copied from the "Bureau du Roi," Reissner's masterpiece, it would be a perfect pleasure to rest in the room, and, indeed, no one save an absolute expert would guess that this instrument, remarkable in its use of broken curves, was not as old and genuine as some of the beautiful pieces with a history to be found round about it.

The deplorable feature of these inharmonious pianos is that it is all so unnecessary, for nowadays the best makers are not only beautifying pianos by admirable workmanship, but they are all the time working out schemes of pianos to suit all styles of decoration. For instance, one may have a grand piano in the style of the Adam brothers. This, like all furniture which revives the Adonis style, is comparatively severe, one might say classic, in design and worked out in delicate satin wood, with a decoration charming in conception and admirable in execution. It would not be difficult to believe, but for the width of the keyboard, that Robert Adam had designed it and Cipriani or Angelica Kauffmann had done the charming panels.

The Watteau-Vernis-Martin style would, however, attract a greater number of persons. A beautiful example is an upright piano covered with a typical chocolate brown Vernis-Martin enamel, speckled with gold. On the top front are three panels after Watteau subjects, while underneath is a beautiful flower piece. More important is a grand, also in the superb enamel which made Martin famous. It has a characteristic subject on the top—a dancing girl in white and a youth in blue. Inside the cover is an impressive landscape after the illustrious Claude. The piano has charming, rather florid, wood scrollwork, richly overlaid with gold. Anybody fortunate enough to have a room in the early Louis XV style would find either of these instruments exquisitely harmonious; not, indeed, except in the eyes of the expert, would they seem out of place in any room furnished in not-empire fashion, while the intrinsic beauty of the instruments would make them seem delightful in any apartment eclectic in fashion.

The instruments described are of course beyond the reach of modest households, but even these are provided for, as a visit of inspection to any first class establishment will testify. Instruments will be found adapted especially for small rooms and slender persons and in a sufficient variety of woods and styles of decoration to meet all requirements.

We all know how difficult it is in the rooms of circumscribed space in which our upright pianos generally find their resting place to make the straight, bare back of the frame the same thing of beauty to the eye that the instrument itself is to the ear. Draperies, alas, are for the moment out of fashion, but fortunately there is the piano secrétaire, a most ingenious contrivance for at once utilizing space and adding to the beauty of our rooms. The piano secrétaire is, as the name indicates, for the purpose of supplying the appliances for writing in an attachment to the frame of a cottage piano. A writing table is formed by a flap, which is let down when wanted and rests securely on two supports. At one side of this is a small bookcase, with glass doors. On the other side is a music rack, which, while not projecting far out, gives room for the few songs or pieces most constantly in demand. Along the top of the attachment runs a small shelf, on which ferns and flowers tastefully arranged will break the long, straight line of the upper part of the piano case. The secrétaire is made to fasten on to the back of any upright instrument.
